

Online retail dataset data visualization

Charts Summary with insights

1. Matplotlib

- Line Chart

Sales reached their peak in November and were lowest in February, with a strong upward trend toward year-end.

- Bar chart

June has the highest average revenue, while November has the lowest, with revenue generally remaining stable across most other months.

- Histogram

Most total prices are concentrated between with frequency decreasing sharply as prices increase, indicating a right-skewed distribution.

- Box plot

Box plot after filtering some quantity to view a proper box chart because with outliers applied the box plot is clustered in a place

The box plot shows that most quantities are relatively low, with several high-value outliers indicating some unusually large orders.

2. Seaborn

- Count plot

Thursday has the highest sales, while Friday has the lowest, with sales generally stronger from Monday to Thursday.

- Violin plot

Weekday and weekend expenses show similar distributions, with most expenses concentrated at lower values and a few higher-value expenses extending the range.

- Heatmap

Quantity and TotalPrice show a moderate positive correlation (0.33), while UnitPrice and TotalPrice have a strong positive correlation (0.89); Quantity and UnitPrice are almost unrelated almost no relationship to either variable.

- Pair plot

TotalPrice generally increases with Quantity and UnitPrice, with most values concentrated at the lower range and a few clear outliers.